Table manners differ widely across the world and each country has its unique traditions. .Today we are sharing (interest)..... dining manners from around the world. In Korea, you have to wait for the oldest person to sit down first. You also don't start (to eat)..... until the elders say, "Let's eat," and during the meal, you don't hold your bowl of soup or rice; you leave it on the table. Really, it's the opposite here in China. People usually hold (they).....chopsticks with one hand and the bowl with another. In England, it is bad manners to point with your knife or fork . Munching your food is also considered (polite)..... In India, you can show the chef that you have really enjoyed your meal by (leave) your plate empty, and we like to eat food with our fingers. In Japan, sometimes it's okay to eat (noisy)..... if you are eating noodles. We usually slurp our noodles to show how much we're enjoying the food, but we only do that with noodles We always joke that eating with fingers makes the food taste more delicious. At the end of the meal, it's common to express gratitude to the host.
